Keith Brent RAAF Aerospace Centre

The book provides a comprehensive account of the proceedings of the 2002 RAAF History Conference held in Canberra on 30 August 2002. It includes speeches, papers, and discussions from the event, offering insights into the evolution of air power and its role in wars of national liberation. The conference covered a wide range of topics, from the historical perspectives of air warfare to contemporary issues in military education and the strategic implications of air power for national security.

Key themes and contributions include:
- The historical context of air power and its role in wars of national liberation.
- The impact of air power on military strategy and the development of air forces.
- Contemporary perspectives on air power and its potential in the 21st century.
- The role of air power in regional conflicts and its implications for international relations.

The book is a valuable resource for students, scholars, and professionals interested in military history, strategic studies, and air power. It provides a platform for understanding the dynamic and evolving nature of air power and its significance in shaping modern and future military operations.
