Manly P. Hall

Self Unfoldment By Disciplines Of Realization: Releasing And Developing Inward Perceptions, Practical Instructions In The Philosophy Of Disciplined Thinking And Feeling

Manly Palmer Hall, 1901-1975, was an American philosopher, writer, and esotericist. His works explored various aspects of spirituality, including the nature of reality, the universe, and human consciousness. Hall was a proponent of the philosophy of disciplined thinking and feeling, as he believed that through self-discipline, individuals could achieve inner growth and develop a more mature philosophy of life. His writings provided practical instructions in the philosophy of disciplined thinking and feeling, emphasizing the importance of developing inner perceptions and personal realization.

In his work, Hall encouraged readers to explore the five steps of ancient disciplines: realization, meditation, self-study, self-control, and personal development. The goal was to achieve a balance between inner and outer experiences, promoting self-awareness and a deeper understanding of the self and the world.

Hall's approach was rooted in the idea that knowledge is not just acquired from external sources but that it also resides within the individual. By developing inner perceptions, one could access this knowledge, leading to a more profound understanding of reality and the self. His writings have been influential in various philosophical and esoteric traditions, inspiring many to explore the depths of their inner experiences and beliefs.
